Portland State University (PSU) recently announced that 10 computer science faculty members have moved from the OGI School of Science & Engineering at Oregon Health & Science University (OHSU) to PSU's Maseeh College of Engineering and Computer Science.

Under this arrangement, internationally recognized OGI computer science faculty in networking and systems, programming languages and formal methods, data-intensive systems (databases), and adaptive systems have moved to PSU's Maseeh College. They will be consolidated within PSU's existing computer science research and education programs, which include research clusters in the areas of software engineering, networking, programming languages, learning systems, high performance computing, and computer security.

The move of 10 tenure-track faculty members includes 20 Ph.D. students and $2 million in externally funded research. Prior to this transition, PSU's Department of Computer Science had 20 faculty members, 450 undergraduate and 120 graduate students, with $1.3 million in externally funded research.

"This move will enable the Maseeh College to advance its mission to be both regionally relevant and nationally prominent in disciplines that are very important to the current and future success of the region," said Dean Robert D. Dryden. "This is the computer science department that Oregon and the region urgently need."
